JEP64	Kadu (plain) "-- soon we were in the midst of another lava-field. The sharp edges of the broken stones were set at all angles, and our camels fell continually in the pitfalls between them. The rough expanse undulated in domes and troughs, waves and ridges, the result of lateral pressure while the rock was still in a pliable state. Some of the domes had been broken by subsequent disturbances, and thier vaults lay gaping, half-filled with the fallen debris. The curved flagstones which had resulted from these fractures presented two distinct surfaces: one was blistered and rough and the other was comparatively smooth. The latter was the under-side, that which had lain in contact with the desert sand, and the rough side was that which had been uppermost, exposed to the action of the atmosphere. All this rock seemed to be of recent origin, for there was little sign of weathering in it." "Here, another of our camels cast himself down and had to be abandoned. -- It fell into one of the subsided domes, and could not rise again. After giving the faithful beast a farewell caress, I took a rifle -- and shot it. The lava-field was called Kadu." [L M Nesbitt (1934)1955 p 284]	13/41	[Ne]

- 1840s The Englishman Mansfield Parkyns on his way from Adwa to Sudan arrived there during the rainy season of 1845.
 Kafta, "the frontier town of this part of Abyssinia, and the market to which the Arabs from some of the Sennari provinces resort. It happened to be market-day, and arriving early in the afternoon I strolled about -- I attracted much attention, being quite a novelty. By most people I was voted a spy; by all I was pronounced a Turk -- I met several Arabs, whose costume was precisely that of all Nubian Bedouin; they had brought a quantity of salt -- and were purchasing slaves and other articles of Abyssinian export. The market was crowded; the principal goods offered for sale seemed to be country cotton stuffs, horses, and slaves."
 After having obtained lodging with great difficulty, Parkyns was fetched by soldiers who said that he was their prisoner. "It was a party from the camp of Lidge Hailo, governor of the frontier, and one of Dejatch Guangwoul's principal men."
 Lij Hailu and Parkyns more or less quarrelled with each other. Parkyns told the Lij that he was as great a man as he, because he was a particular friend of Dejasmach Shitu (Shétou in Parkyns's spelling).
 One of Parkyns's servants succeeded secretly to reach the camp of Dejasmach Gwangul and in this way obtained a message that Parkyns should be set free. This was obeyed immediately. The Lij invited Parkyns to a meal and proved to be courteous. He tried to persuade Parkyns to go back and take the road via Gondar, but when Parkyns persisted the Lij provided him with a couple of camels free of charge.
