 Jon Kalb and Herb Mosca in May 1975: "After fording the Hawadi River, we followed a rocky track leading up the escarpment to the village of Kure Beret -- it was market day. Oromo and Amhara traders and farmers were down from the highlands doing a lively business with the Afar up from the lowlands."
 There were Afar girls with lots of adornment. "One girl had braids tied beneath her chin, of some particular significance; another had a red ribbon wrapped around her head; and all wore baubles or large metal medallions on their foreheads."

 (also a corresponding area in Sudan)
 The area is located at slightly less than 1000 m altitude.
 Gold is reported from Gubela mountain.
 [Mineral 1966]
 When it became obvious in 1940 that the British would attack from Sudan, the Italians confined themselves to limited advances on the frontiers where there was a British post close to their own, apparently with the object of giving some exercise to the aggressive spirit of their colonial troops and eliminating an enemy post which was close enough to be a nuisance. Thus on the Sudan frontier first Gallabat, then Kassala and then Kurmuk, on 7 July 1940, were attacked and captured.
 A number of frontier posts, including Kurmuk, were held by Sudan police who had volunteered for active service, commanded by assistant district commissioners who had been given governor-general's commissions with the rank of bimbashi. Kurmuk was commanded by Bimbashi Mervyn Bell, with three British auxiliaries and 51 police.
 [Shirreff 1995 p 35]
 When, after an aerial bombardment, the post was attacked on 7 July by a colonial battalion and 100 banda supported by machine guns and artillery, they put up a sturdy resistance until Bell withdrew his men in good order. British casualties were one killed and two wounded, including an American missionary who happened to be staying that night; Italian casualties were reported as four Italians and 40 ascari killed, including the battalion commander, Major Christini.
 [Shirref p 35-36]
 "After preliminary skirmishes close to the provincial boundary in 1984, the SPLA /Sudanese People's Liberation Army/ established its presence in the Blue Nile at the end of 1985, when they appeared in the border hills south of Kurmuk and began to set up a base just inside Ethiopia."
 "From early 1986, SPLA units began to move through the outlying settlements of the southern Blue Nile region, avoiding main routes as they travelled between camps in Ethiopia and the White Nile."

 Nowadays in the south-western corner of Mursi territory, but 200 years ago rather in the centre of Mursi-occupied land. The progressive spreading out from Kurum seems to date from the 1890s.
 In January 1991 the Mursi, at Kurum, carried through the long overdue creation of a new male age set, by means of a three-day ritual. The set was given the name Geleba, and the age span of the set was 15-45 years. The ritual was carried out under the eyes of the hostile Nyangatom on the opposite bank of the Omo river.
